“Teach to Learn”

BY KENNETH BERGER

Paulo Coelho is best known for his book, “The Alchemist.” It’s a good read. However, it was Coelho’s “The Pilgrimage,” which he published a year earlier, that had the larger impact on me, if for nothing else than introducing the notion that a special form of learning comes from teaching.

Think about your own experience. From parenting to mentoring to simply explaining an idea to another, we learn when we teach. I’ve always said that the best lawyers I know happen to be the ones who are quickest to share their time and knowledge. These people are teachers. They are also lifelong learners. They are students of the law who in turn become masters by conveying ideas and expanding upon them. Though the process begins through an accumulation of reading and listening, it culminates and repeats through writing and speaking.

I do my best to give time to young lawyers and business people, not only because the same is/was done for me, but also because I benefit. Ideas crystallize, and what once seemed complex tends to become simple. If you want to better understand a concept, first learn from the absolute best teacher you can find, then teach the concept to others who follow your path.

INTOXICATED BOATER CAUSES SKULL FRACTURE

It is early-May 2016. A large group gathers on a sandbar that runs along Lake Marion. The group is drinking alcohol, playing music, and enjoying the warm spring weather. As the afternoon begins to give way to dusk, one of the men - who is a few years older than most of the crowd - assures his passengers that he is fine to drive, and takes off from the sand bar.

He is not fine. He strikes a concrete pillar. Our client, Ashley, is thrown forward, striking her head on the concrete post as she flies out of the boat. She then lands in the water. Rather than stop and try to help the injured girl, the drunken boat owner keeps going. Fortunately, there is a man on a jet ski who witnesses the incident, and is able to pull Ashley out of the lake before she goes completely under.

In addition to a skull fracture, Ashley suffers bleeding on the brain. Though the first few months are extremely challenging, she now appears to be on the road to a full recovery.

Ashley was one of four people injured. The owner of the boat, however, only has $100,000.00 in insurance coverage. The challenge therefore became how to obtain as much of a small pie as possible for Ashley, and to put sufficient pressure on the insurance company early in the case to force them to pay without the time and expense of multi-year litigation. I am pleased to say we accomplished both objectives for our client.

NURSING HOMES: THE WARNING SIGNS AND EVIDENCE OF ABUSE

The term “nursing home abuse” can have a variety of definitions. It may include harm that’s inflicted physically, emotionally, sexually, or verbally. No matter what type of abuse an elderly person experiences, our laws in South Carolina are intended to hold the individual culprit and facility responsible.

If you think your loved one is suffering at the hands of a caregiver, report your concerns to the nursing home director, the South Carolina Department of Social Services, and the Lt. Governor’s Office on Aging. You may also consider filing a legal claim against the facility.

Physical Signs of Abuse

The CDC estimates that more than 500,000 adults experience abuse or neglect every year in the United States. Make sure you are aware of the potential red flags and warning signs, including:

- bed sores
- hair loss
- malnutrition or dehydration
- cuts, scrapes, bruises or burns
- head injuries or broken bones
- unexplained infections or sexually transmitted diseases
- unexplained weight loss or weight gain
- torn, bloody or stained bedding or clothes
- unsanitary conditions, poor hygiene or a smell of urine or feces
- sudden changes in financial accounts or missing personal items

Emotional Signs of Abuse

Elder abuse may also wreak emotional and mental havoc. An abused patient may exhibit the following behaviors that you need to be aware of:

- fear of being touched
- agitation
- withdrawal
- infantile behavior
- unresponsiveness
- listlessness, wandering or being non-communicative
- anxiety around certain or all staff members.

While these behaviors are not always evidence of victimization, when present with other emotional or physical symptoms, they could be cause for concern. Speak to your loved one candidly about their care, and report any suspected abuse to the appropriate personnel and state agencies. If you notice any of these signs, report it immediately.

I have helped a number of families take action against abusive senior care facilities, and am here to answer questions you may have. I do not want to see any more vulnerable, elderly citizens mistreated. Nor do I want another facility in South Carolina to get away with hurting the innocent. To speak with me today, call 803-790-2800.
